Letter to school trustees on human rights concerns with the use of School Liaison Officers in B.C. schools

Vancouver B.C. – B.C.'s Human Rights Commissioner issued a letter to the BC School Trustees Association recommending that the use of School Liaison Officers (SLOs) in British Columbian schools be ended by all school districts, unless and until they can demonstrate an evidence-based need for them that cannot be met through other services.

In the letter, Commissioner Kasari Govender highlights significant concerns raised by marginalized students, their families and communities about harm caused by police presence in schools. While there is a lack of research in Canada about the impact of SLO programs on Indigenous, Black and other racialized students, American research has found that SLOs contribute to a sense of criminalization and surveillance in schools, especially disadvantaging marginalized students.

"There is an immediate need for research conducted in British Columbia that centres the experience of marginalized students and employs high-quality evaluation strategies," stated Commissioner Govender, further recommending that civilian alternatives to SLOs be explored.

"I strongly recommend that all school districts end the use of SLOs until the impact of these programs can be established empirically." – Kasari Govender, B.C.'s Human Rights Commissioner

"Out of respect for the rights of our students, I strongly recommend that all school districts end the use of SLOs until the impact of these programs can be established empirically," said Commissioner Kasari Govender.

"For school boards who choose not to take this step, it is incumbent on you to produce independent evidence of a need for SLOs that cannot be met through civilian alternatives and to explain the actions you are taking to address the concerns raised by Indigenous, Black and other marginalized communities," she concluded.
