B.C.'s Human Rights Commissioner is granted intervenor status in cases that will test B.C.'s Declaration Act in court for the first time

Vancouver B.C. – B.C.'s Supreme Court has granted B.C.'s Human Rights Commissioner leave to intervene in two cases—Gitxaala Nation v. Chief Gold Commissioner of B.C. et al. and Ehattesaht First Nation v. His Majesty the King in right of B.C. et al.—that will mark the first legal tests of B.C.'s Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act (DRIPA or the Declaration Act) since it became law in 2019. The Declaration Act plays an important role in decolonization and reconciliation efforts in the province.

“The cases brought by Gitxaala and Ehattesaht First Nations against British Columbia have the potential to set an important precedent about the legal effect of DRIPA.” – Kasari Govender, B.C.'s Human Rights Commissioner

“The cases brought by Gitxaala and Ehattesaht First Nations against British Columbia have the potential to set an important precedent about the legal effect of DRIPA,” said Kasari Govender, B.C.'s Human Rights Commissioner.

“I am looking forward to assisting the court by providing legal submissions about how to interpret and apply this legislation as a human rights statute that affirms the application of UNDRIP to the laws of British Columbia,” she concluded.
